

* ENTERTAINMENT * ENTERTAINMENT

MICHELLE THRUSH with young Kootenai Brown co-star.

LOUIS B. HOBSON

Movies

Native issues inspire Thrush

IT TOOK Michelle Thrush considerably longer than most struggling actresses to get star struck. In 1984, when she was a student at Calgary's Plains Indian Cultural Survival School, Thrush was cast in the Canadian film Isaac Little Feathers.

Though her co-stars included Scott (Night Heat) Hylands and Lou (The Diary Of Anne Frank) Jacob, Thrush returned to the classroom rather than seeking out a film career.

"Acting has always been and will always be my second love," insists the 30-year-old Native actress.

"My first love will always be working towards social changes for my people."

After graduating, Thrush joined a Native dance troupe called Red Thunder with whom she travelled to New Zealand.

"Shortly after we returned to Canada, I was cast in the National Film Board mini-series Daughters Of The Country," she recalls.

"It paid great but working in film still didn't fulfill my political desires."

Eventually Thrush realized that "as a young Native woman, no one really took what I was saying seriously."

"I saw acting as a way of gaining a voice which could make a difference for my people."

Thrush moved to Vancouver and, within a year, won the female lead in Kootenai Brown, a historical adventure film.

The movie also stars Tom Berntsen, Raymond Burr (Ferry Mason, Ironside) and Donnelly Rhodes (Danger Bay).

Kootenai Brown will have its Calgary premiere tomorrow at the Palliser Square cinemas to benefit the Canadian Film Celebration.

For information and tickets, call 268-1370.

The movie will have a regular run at the Plaza Theatre beginning Feb. 24.

SINCE COMPLETING Kootenai Brown, Thrush starred opposite Lou Diamond Phillips (La Bamba) and Fred Ward (Rambo Williams) in Robert Redford's thriller, Dark Wind, and with Gary Farmer (Pow Wow Highway) in Day-Glo Warrior.

Today the actress will be at her former school performing her one-woman show Reclaim.

On Thursday, she will attend the local premiere of Kootenai Brown.

Later this month, Thrush begins rehearsals for a Vancouver stage version of The Ecstasy Of Rita Joe.